The interpretation of the symbols used in the tables throughout the Year Book will be found on p. viii of this volume.

Canada's growth in the past decade has created many new problems in the planning of health and welfare services. Population has increased by one half in this period. General prosperity, growing urbanization and industrialization, larger numbers of children and aged persons in the population, and new concepts and knowledge in health and welfare matters have all contributed to needs for additional services and to a greater interdependence among the health and welfare professions.

During 1963, the Royal Commission on Health Services continued its investigation into the existing health facilities and the future needs for health services for the people of Canada; its report was made in June 1964.[†] The nation's attention was attracted to health
