

The Hill — under whose towered crown has unfolded the panorama of Canada's political history and from whose halls have emanated the national laws under which have lived and laboured a free, diverse and united people. The Hill spans the years, through the struggle of beginnings in a vast and challenging land to the present excitement of a changing, growing, developing nation. The small stone building nestling at its side, standing as it stood in 1827 when it was erected as a workshop for the builders of the Rideau locks and canal, is a reminder of those who turned a great untouched domain into the flourishing Canada of today.
